INFRASTRUCTURE

Cyclists continue push for path along western span of Bay Bridge despite high price tag

CBS News, April 26th 2026

The ability to get around the Bay Area by bicycle has become a major focus of transportation planners, but there has always been one major roadblock: the western span of the Bay Bridge.

There is a plan to fill that gap, but it comes with a hefty price tag. On Saturday, the cycling community turned out to keep the dream alive.

A group of about 100 cyclists met at the West Oakland BART station on Saturday morning. Their destination was the Bay Bridge to nowhere, or at least that's how it feels to them.

San Francisco rolls out autonomous robots for EV charging

EV driving just got even simpler for residents of Treasure Island in San Francisco, thanks to a fridge-sized self-driving robot designed to drive to, plug into, and charge cars.

According to a report from the San Francisco Chronicle, the machine, called "X-Caddie," was built by energy technology company EneRenew.

The robot is designed to quietly glide through parking lots using sensors and low-noise motors. Equipped with a charging arm and onboard battery pack, it eliminates many of the hassles associated with public charging.
