She shared the project's alignment with the SDDTAC priorities through addressing the harms of SSBs and relationship to chronic diseases, working with low income Latine-Spanish speaking community members, building community capacity and cross partnership with various stakeholders. Vanessa shared the work CARECEN conducted at the beginning of the grant and provided the most updated work within the past year till the end of the grant period.

Fiorella Bernal shared that the community was interested in focusing on healthier alternative to SSBs, when there is low community knowledge of SF tap water quality and a desire to increase access to water testing (for low cost or free). CARECEN partnered with SF PUC on pilot project to test water for lead. 17 completed the lead testing and resulted that all tests resulted in good quality water in their homes. Post survey results included: 47% trust in tap water, 18% drink no SSBs vs. 11% and that 14% decrease in SSB consumption more than 6 times per week.

Successes of the program included training new promotoras around water education and community advocacy, exposure of community to City institution and systems, community confidence in advocacy, water testing pilot, established relationship with SFPUC and broader interest in continuing work from other community partners.

CARECEN's next steps are to speak with community to get their feedback, present to SFPUC team about what learned from this work and best practices, results of 5 years of this work, explore ways to partner with other communities around water confidence and explore funding opportunities to support this work.
